A major development in Bitcoin in 2017 was the birth of SegWit, which aims to scale Bitcoin up without requiring expensive changes to the way the network operates. SegWit was proposed in November 2016, but as it stands, Bitcoin is only in a temporary implementation of the technology. However, SegWit is an important milestone for bitcoin scaling, as it lays the groundwork for the much more important second-layer scaling plans being developed by the Bitcoin Core developer team. Why does bitcoin need scaling? There's lots of useful work done in the blockchain, and users of bitcoin can access that work without dealing with a centralised repository or agency. But that puts a very big demand on the network. To enable millions of people to use the blockchain, it has to cope with some pretty big transactions, which can chew up blocks very quickly. It's a mix of mostly single-track courses with sections that are road, road/path, and mtb. Two passages of the roubaix-style cobbles, one of them pretty rough and one of them smooth. The cobbles are (aside from the rough one) very short. The rest of the route is pretty straightforward. This is the route that I have been told it is appropriate to ride, although it is only possible to travel part of the route at one time because of the price of the fare.
